APPENDIX

September 30, 2014 Published Opinion of Division II of the Court of Appeals A 1-27

Order Denying Petitioner’s Motion for Reconsideration.....A 28

A. IDENTITY OF PETITIONER

Jean Walsh asks this Court to accept review of the Division II Court of Appeals decisions terminating review as designated in Part B of this petition pursuant to RAP 13.3(a)(1) and RAP 13.4(b).

B. COURT OF APPEALS DECISION

Walsh seeks review of the published Division II Court of Appeals Decision entered on September 30, 2014 (the “Opinion”), (Appendix 1-27) and the Order denying Walsh’s Motion for Reconsideration entered on November 6, 2014 (Appendix 28).

C. ISSUES PRESENTED FOR REVIEW

1. The Court of Appeals treated the property acquired by these parties during an equity relationship as community property instead of as community-like property. Does such characterization of property extend the law to a common law marriage in conflict with precedent of the Supreme Court and between the Divisions?
2. Does the expansion of the equity relationship doctrine to recharacterize property characterized as separate property at acquisition as community property at termination of the relationship ignore the intentions to the parties, thus raising substantial issues of public interest?
3. Does retroactive application of community property rights to periods when that right was never available for these parties affront due process by divesting separate property interests without prior notice?
4. When an appeal is singularly focused on property distribution under the equity relationship doctrine, does the award of attorney’s fees to the prevailing party on appeal conflict with Washington law?

D. STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The parties are two women who began dating in 1988. CP 364. At that time, Jean Walsh had an established orthopedic surgery practice in Fresno, California, and owned her own home. Id.

Throughout their relationship, Walsh and Reynolds maintained separate financial identities, rarely sharing joint expenses or assets. Id. The parties routinely titled property in the manner they intended to own it: if property was intended to be jointly owned, it was titled in both parties' names, if intended to be owned by only one, it was titled as such. E.g. CP 364-65, 367, 370.

Each woman had her own bank accounts, retirement accounts, vehicles and liabilities (credit cards). At times, the parties owned a "family" car, which was jointly titled. Id. CP 364-65. Walsh was always solely liable for the mortgages. CP 367. While Reynolds was an authorized user of two of Walsh's credit cards for household purchases, Walsh alone was liable for those debts. CP 364. When Walsh paid one of Reynold's credit cards, it was treated as a loan and repaid. The parties maintained this intentional manner of organizing their financial lives from the commencement of their relationship consistently until the relationship ended. E.g. CP 370. At no time during the parties' co-habitation were they eligible to be married in their home jurisdiction, and they never chose to be legally married in other jurisdictions when that right became available. Both parties understood that the law did not recognize their relationship and took steps to confirm their intentions.

From the early years of the relationship, Reynolds received a salary for housekeeping and childcare services. CP 364. These funds were her own, and while paid by Walsh, Reynolds maintained these funds as separate. Id. Walsh paid the expenses relating to the home, or the children. CP 365. In total, Reynolds received more than $500,000.00 of disposable income between 1990 and 2011. Id. She was free to invest, spend or save those funds without Walsh's interference. Id.

The parties had three children: Julia, born to Walsh in 1992, Joseph, born to Walsh in 1996, and Emily, born to Reynolds in 1998. CP 364-65. Each child was cross-adopted by the other party. Id. This was the method available at the time to carry-out the intention of both parties to become a legal parent of each child.

On March 6, 2000, the parties registered as domestic partners in California. CP 366. The California domestic partnership was extremely limited in scope and offered no benefits to them. Id. The purpose behind registering was to stop being "invisible." RP 68-69.

When the parties registered, California domestic partnership law specifically provided no property rights. The law stated:

The Filing of the Declaration of Domestic Partnership pursuant to [AB 26] shall not, in and of itself, create any interest in, or rights to, any property, real or personal, owned by one partner in the other partner, including but not limited to, rights similar to community property or quasi-community property.

AB 26 Bill Analysis, Assembly Floor, 09/08/1999. CP 366.

The law created no duty to the registrants to keep a current address on file with the California Secretary of State. CP 367-68.

Similarly, the law did not indicate that any obligations created by the registration could be altered in the future. California domestic partnership law was expanded in 2005 to add, in part, community property rights.

The parties moved to Washington in June 2000. CP 366. They thereafter received no notices regarding their domestic partnership from the State of California. CP 368.

The parties ultimately moved to a home in Federal Way. CP 367. Walsh used the proceeds from the sale of her previous home, and pre-inheritance funds from her father, to acquire and remodel the property. Id. Walsh was solely liable on the mortgage. Reynolds made minimal financial contributions to the Federal Way home between its acquisition and the end of the relationship.

In August 2009, the parties registered as domestic partners in Washington. CP 368. Walsh entered into the registered domestic partnership for inheritance purposes. RP 91. Because the registered domestic partnership form stated that the status could be altered by will or deed, Walsh believed it not irrevocable. RP 44-45, 91. The parties separated seven months later, on March 14, 2010. CP 369. However, their romantic and intimate relationship had been over for approximately fifteen years. CP 365.

E. ARGUMENT

1. An Equity Relationship is not a Marriage. Expansion of the Equity Relationship Doctrine in this Case Amounts to the Creation of Common Law Marriage.

The equity relationship doctrine¹ is not equivalent to marriage. Principles of the division of property are applied analogously. Doing otherwise would create a common law marriage which has been expressly renounced in Washington for 122 years. In re McLaughlin's Estate, 4 Wash. 570, 30 P. 651 (1892).

To protect the equity relationship doctrine from becoming a common law marriage, the Court has recognized limitations. For example, the equity relationship doctrine does not create community property, it does not afford a partner in such relationship the rights of a “spouse” for purposes of the wrongful death statute, and does not trigger the marital compensation provision under the unemployment compensation statute. Connell v. Francisco, 127 Wn.2d 339, 349-50, 898 P.2d 831 (1995) (citing Roe v. Ludtke Trucking, Inc., 46 Wn. App. 816, 732 P.2d 1021 (1987); Davis v. Dep’t of Emp. Sec., 108 Wn.2d 272, 278-79, 737 P.2d 1262 (1987)). The laws of property division at the end of a marriage do not directly apply, but offer guidance. Id.

To divide property, the Court first determines whether an equity relationship exists, then evaluates the interest each party has in the property acquired, and only then makes a just and equitable distribution of the community-like property. Soltero v. Wimer, 159 Wn.2d 428, 433, 150 P.3d 552 (2007). Unlike a marriage, however, the property acquired during the relationship is not presumed community property. Id. at 434. Instead, property acquired during the equity relationship is presumed “community-like” property, a presumption that is rebuttable. Id. Significantly, the separate property of the parties is not subject to distribution. Id. (emphasis in original). Indeed, the court lacks jurisdiction over separate property. Connell, 127 Wn.2d at 352 (“In summary, we hold that property which would have been characterized as separate property had the couple been married is not before the trial court for division at the end of the relationship.”).

In this case, the parties began their relationship in 1988 and could not marry for most of their relationship.² Marriage was not legally available to same sex couples in any jurisdiction for the majority of that period. Instead, the parties intentionally organized their lives consistent with their awareness that they did not (and could not) have a legal marriage. Walsh and Reynolds titled and held property with precise consistency as “yours, mine, or ours.” Any presumption that the parties created community-like property was rebuttable, not only by demonstration of separate property rights acquired before the relationship, but by the parties’ intention to maintain property in the forms of ownership available to them throughout their relationship (i.e., joint tenancy and separate bank accounts).

The Opinion, however, disposes of the second prong of analysis (analyzing the character of each parties’ interest in property), and dissolves the concept of “community-like” property within an equity relationship. Instead, the Opinion removes the characterization of “community-like” from the discussion, and expressly instructs the trial court to treat property acquired prior to 2005 as community property. RCW 26.16.010-030 has not been treated as definitive in application because the relationship is not a marriage. Pursuant to that statute, the characterization of property as community or separate attaches upon acquisition, with each party acquiring an undivided one-half interest in community property. Community-like property is applied by analogy at the termination of an equity relationship.

The Opinion disregards the distinction of applying community property concepts by analogy, not as a rule. One particular distribution is illustrative. After ruling that “the trial court correctly concluded as a matter of law that Walsh and Reynolds owned the Federal Way property as tenants in common,” (A 22) the Court treated the asset (acquired years before the Washington domestic partnership registration) as if subject to a dissolution of a marriage, when all property is before the Court.

Nevertheless, in a dissolution proceedings, a trial court has discretion to divide the parties’ assets in a manner that it determines is “just and equitable.” In re Marriage of Farmer, 172 Wn.2d 616, 625, 259 P.3d 256 (2011) (quoting RCW 26.09.080). Considering Reynolds’ non-financial contributions to the property and regardless of Walsh’s claims of her separate property contributions, the trial court here exercised this discretion, by awarding Reynolds “close to a 50 [percent] share in the equity in the Federal Way home.”

Pg. 23 (emphasis added). The Federal Way home was an asset acquired by separate funds. It was improved with separate funds. As tenants in common, each was entitled to only their proportionate share. See Iredell v. Iredell, 49 Wn.2d 627, 305 P.2d 805 (1957); West v. Knowles, 50 Wn.2d 311, 311 P.2d 689 (1957). Instead, the Opinion disregards Walsh’s separate investment and treats separate property as before the Court for distribution upon the finding of an equity relationship. The Court neither considered nor discussed that the presumption was rebuttable. Indeed, the Opinion contains a section headed “Community Property,” which fails to consider the character or interest in property, despite evidence in the record that significant assets were Walsh’s separate property. A 9-11.

The titling of property was not by happenstance, or custom (with the intent of joint ownership through a marital-like relationship), but rather intentional. Compare Olver, supra (the parties titled property in the man’s name, consistent with customs of their culture). Instead of considering whether property was “community-like” or “quasi-community” property, the Court of Appeals instructs the trial court to “(1) reconsider whether the parties had a common law ‘equity relationship' before January 1, 2005; and (2) if so, to redistribute the parties' community assets accordingly." A 2. This mandate confers jurisdiction over separate property which, prior to this decision, has not been subject to distribution. It is also termed property acquired during an equity relationship as "community assets" not quasi or community like. By extending the "rights and protections of marriage," the Court has expanded the doctrine to transform property acquired by an unmarried co-habitant to "community."

The Opinion is in conflict with decisions issued by this Court, and all divisions of the Court of Appeals that have recognized (1) property acquired during an equity relationship is not community property, but community-like or quasi-community property, (2) this presumption is rebuttable, and (3) the Court lacks jurisdiction over separate property.

Treating unmarried co-habiting parties as having acquired community property, and ignoring that the presumption is rebuttable, the Opinion makes this doctrine akin to a common law marriage. The public has a significant interest in prohibiting common law marriage, especially one that arises without notice or opportunity to opt out. Common law marriages were expressly abolished in Washington, and the Court and the Legislature have consistently recognized that marriage is created only by statute. While the expansion of property distribution rights under the equity relationship doctrine does not confer all of the rights and benefits of marriage, it erodes a critical distinction between this doctrine applying to cohabitants who have “knowledge that a lawful marriage between them does not exist,” In re Marriage of Lindsey, 101 Wn.2d 299, 304, 678 P.2d 328 (1984), and a marriage. Time and time again, the Court has reiterated that an equity relationship is not a marriage. See Peffley-Warner v. Bowen, 113 Wn.2d 243, 253, 778 P.2d 1022 (1989) (a woman is not a wife under the meretricious relationship doctrine and cannot receive a share as a “spouse” under the intestate succession laws). In re Long & Fregeau, 158 Wn. App. 919, 929, 244 P.3d 26 (2011). No other Division of the Court of Appeals has held that the parties acquire community property as if they were married.

2. Substantial Public Interest is served by Giving Significant Weight to Parties’ Intentions with Regard to the Characterization and Ownership of Separate Property, Even under the Equity Relationship Doctrine.

To treat unmarried parties as if married, but only with regard to the distribution of property at the termination of the relationship, contravenes the public interest to allow individuals to organize their lives as they choose, foisting upon them a distribution that does not result in equity.

In Connell, the Court recognized that the parties to an equity relationship chose not to get married (although available), and therefore separate property is not before the Court. Connell v. Francisco, 127 Wn.2d 339, 350, 898 P.2d 831 (1995). See also In re Pennington, 142 Wn.2d 592, 604, 14 P.3d 764 (2000). The Court acknowledged that this limitation preserves the distinction between married and unmarried persons. When parties choose not to marry, or as here, when marriage is not legally available to the parties, they can intentionally acquire or maintain their property, and share or refrain from joint ownership interests. Expanding the equity relationship doctrine ultimately treats two individuals, who never intended to jointly own property, as if they were married. Longevity of a relationship alone, absent any commingling of assets, should be insufficient to retroactively create community property rights. To do so contravenes the right to acquire and hold separate property. Having been discriminated against by the denial of the right to legally marry, Walsh is now treated as though that history did not exist.

Walsh's argument does not seek to revert to Creasman v. Boyle, 31 Wn.2d 345, 196 P.2d 835 (1948), but instead asks the Court to recognize that the retroactive application of a common law doctrine has dismantled the only legal mechanism these parties had at the time: the manner in which they could establish separately or jointly owned property. Instead, Walsh asks this Court to give effect to the parties' intention as exemplified by 22 years of careful and consistent application of titling property in the manner in which it was owned. These parties were keenly aware that their relationship had no legal recognition except as advanced by state law. Great weight should be given to the intention of these parties to maintain separate property.

Same-sex couples may now choose the certainty of a legal marriage. Here, applying a doctrine that was unavailable to these parties presumes they could or should have known to acquire and hold property in a different manner. It effectively removes the ability of unmarried individuals to choose how one acquires property at the time of acquisition.

The facts of this case highlight the public's interest in protecting the ability to choose to not marry, without being treated by the Court at the termination of the relationship as if married. Marriage was not available to these parties throughout most of their relationship. The Court should preserve the rights of individuals and accept review of the Opinion.

3. Retroactively Divesting a Party's Vested Separate Property Rights Violates Fundamental Concepts of Due Process and Raises Significant Issues of Public Concern.

At no point during these parties' relationship could they marry in Washington. The Court of Appeals decided that the equity relationship doctrine extended community property rights to these parties before their Washington registered domestic partnership in 2009, and even before 2005 when the parties could first have had notice of the potential for acquiring community property rights (in California). The trial court concluded:

Application of the equity relationship doctrine prior to the January 1, 2005 effective date of California's expanded domestic partnership law would deprive these individuals of vested property rights without due process of law.

CP 372. Neither party challenged this finding on appeal.

Not until the amendment to the 2008 Domestic Partnership Act in Washington, were community property rights granted to Washington registered domestic partners. Only then could either party have been on notice that a domestic partnership could be deemed to create community property rights. Until then, community property rights were available only through marriage. In 1988, when the parties' relationship began, the equity relationship doctrine was in its early stages. (Lindsey, which overturned the Creasman presumption, was decided in 1984).

The Court of Appeals rejected the significance of the expansion of the Washington and California statutes as providing the first opportunity for notice to the parties that community property rights may apply, and instead relied on the equity relationship doctrine. Even under that doctrine, no same-sex couple in Washington would have had notice that they could be deemed to acquire community-like property rights until 2005.³ Gormley v. Robertson, 120 Wn. App. 31, 83 P.3d 1042 (2004).

The state of the law and public opinion has changed with regards to equal rights for same-sex couples, but the Court cannot ignore or pretend that the law was different during these parties' relationship. The rights that are available to same-sex couples now were not available to this couple when they acquired property. Retroactively applying the equity relationship doctrine to a time when the law did not provide these rights to the parties, has caused a divestment of separate property rights: the parties had no notice, nor any reason to believe that the property they acquired would be distributed years later in a way different from how each titled their property.

Fundamental notions of fairness and due process are affronted when a person's separate property rights are divested by retroactive application of a judicially created doctrine that creates new rights and obligations at the termination of the relationship that were never available to them during the relationship. Judicial enforcement of relationships between individuals has been deemed sufficient state action to constitute a violation of constitutional rights. Shelley v. Kramer, 341 U.S. 1, 68 S. Ct. 836 (1948). Here, by consistently referring to property acquired even before 2005 as community property (not "community-like" or "quasi-community"), the Court divested Walsh's separate property rights by judicial fiat.

The type of divestment created hereby expansion of the law from 1988 to 2005 to find different rights at termination of a relationship, is the precise confusion Justice Sanders warned of in the Concurrence Opinion in Vasquez,

Were it not the rule that the lawful ability to wed is a prerequisite to establishing a meretricious relationship, one of the few objective criteria of assistance to the Court or cohabitating couples to determine whether such a relationship could possibly exist would simply vanish.

Legitimate expectations of cohabiting individuals, whether opposite sex or otherwise, would be defeated in the sense that they would be even less secure in the possession of distribution of property to which they were lawfully entitled...In short, although some may view this proceeding as an opportunity to vindicate the rights of cohabiting homosexuals (assuming these individuals are homosexuals), the unintended consequence would be to deny each of these partners the opportunity to dispose of his entitled assets as each saw fit, even upon demise...Certainly, one's entitlements, as well as the right of one to voluntarily dispose or transfer his or her property in the manner seen fit by the individual, are values promoted by the rule of law which should not be lightly discarded or carelessly obscured.

146 Wn.2d at 114-16.

The trial court held that application of the equity relationship doctrine prior to January 2005, violates due process. CP 372. The Opinion disregards Walsh's right to this constitution protection with no explicit ruling overturning the trial court.

4. Awarding Attorneys' Fees on Appeal for Issues Involving only Equity Relationship Doctrine is in Conflict with Decisions of the Supreme Court and other Divisions of the Court of Appeals.

The Opinion was dedicated to application of the equity relationship doctrine, and the Court expressly stated that the dissolution of the registered domestic partnership was not appealed. Instead, the only issues on appeal related to whether the parties were in an equity relationship and, if so, the impact upon property distribution. The opinion expressly states:

The trial court also ruled that property the parties had acquired after they registered as domestic partners in Washington—between August 20, 2009, and their separation on March 14, 2010—was subject to Washington’s community property law and RCW 26.60.080. Neither party disputes the trial court’s application of Washington’s statutory community property law to this post-August 20, 2009 period of their relationship. Thus, the trial court’s distribution of community property acquired during this latter period is not at issue on appeal.

Opinion, Note 10. The Court further noted that RCW 26.09.080, which provides the “framework for a trial court’s distribution of a couple’s domestic partnership property,” does not control here: “Thus, this statute [RCW 26.09.080] does not control distribution of property that Walsh and Reynolds accumulated during their relationship before the 2008 amendment.” A 17. Awarding attorney’s fees on appeal of issues arising under the equity relationship doctrine has created a conflict between the Divisions of the Court of Appeals, and the decision of this Court in Connell.

Division I has denied awarding attorney’s fees on appeal of dissolution of an equity relationship. Relying on Western Comm’y Bank v. Helmer, 48 Wn. App. 694, 740 P.2d 359 (1987), the Court declined awarding fees pursuant to RCW 26.09.140. “The extension of property distribution rights of spouses to partners in meretricious relationships does not elevate meretricious relationships themselves to the level of marriage for all purposes.” Connell, 127 Wn.2d at 349 (quoting Davis, 108 Wn.2d 272). Attorney’s fees under RCW 26.09.140 are not available for the dissolution and distribution of property under the equity relationship doctrine. See Id. Here, the Washington registered domestic partnership was less than seven months long, and the division of property acquired during that period was never disputed. The issue on appeal was solely the division of property acquired outside of the registered domestic partnership. It was error to apply RCW 26.09.140 to award attorney’s fees on appeal under RAP 18.1.

F. CONCLUSION

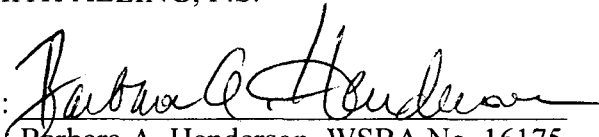

The Opinion expands the equity relationship doctrine and the property rights created under that doctrine, retroactively creating community property. No Washington Court has previously granted such broad rights pursuant to an equity relationship. In retroactively applying that expansion to these parties, the Court has divested separate property without regard to intention. Expansion of the doctrine is inconsistent with precedent of this Court and creates a conflict between the Divisions. This retroactive divestment of separate property creates an issue of constitutional law and raises serious issues of public interest. Awarding attorney’s fees on appeal for division of property after an equity relationship is in conflict with previous opinions of this Court and Division One.

Petitioner respectfully requests this Court grant review.

IN THE COURT OF APPEALS OF THE STATE OF WASHINGTON

DIVISION II

In re the Domestic Partnership of:

No. 44289-2-II

JEAN M. WALSH,

Appellant/Cross-Respondent,

v.

KATHRYN L. REYNOLDS,

PUBLISHED OPINION

Respondent/Cross-Appellant.

HUNT, J. — Jean M. Walsh appeals and Kathryn L. Reynolds cross-appeals the trial court’s decree of dissolution of domestic partnership, challenging the court’s findings of fact and conclusions of law. They argue that the trial court erred in (1) ruling that they had lived in an “equity relationship”¹ between January 1, 2005, and August 20, 2009; (2) ruling that they owned their Federal Way home as tenants in common; and (3) awarding each approximately 50 percent share of equity in the Federal Way home.² Walsh also appeals the trial court's award of attorney fees and costs to Reynolds.

We affirm the trial court's finding of an "equity relationship" between the parties for purposes of equitably allocating their community property in dissolving their registered domestic partnership. We reverse the trial court's finding that this "equity relationship" began only in 2005 and remand to the trial court to reconsider and to amend its finding about when the parties' "equity relationship" began and then to reassess its equitable distribution of community property based on this finding. We also affirm the trial court's award of attorney fees and costs to Reynolds, and we grant her attorney fees and costs on appeal.

I. RELATIONSHIP

Jean Margaret Walsh is an orthopedic surgeon living in Pierce County. In 1986, she moved to Fresno, California, where she purchased a home with her personal savings. In 1987, she used additional personal savings to purchase a private medical practice.

In 1988, Walsh met Kathryn Reynolds. After dating for about three months, Reynolds moved into Walsh's Fresno home, but she paid no mortgage or utilities. Thereafter, Walsh and Reynolds lived together for 20 years but maintained separate bank accounts and financial records. Reynolds was then working for a hardware store; she later worked for a custom home builder.

² Each party seeks a greater share of the assets than the trial court awarded. More specifically, Walsh argues that the trial court should have applied community property law more narrowly, i.e., only to assets acquired as of their Washington domestic partnership registration on August 20, 2009 (thereby decreasing the community assets available for distribution and leaving a greater share of assets as her separate property). Reynolds argues that the trial court should have applied community property law more expansively, i.e., to assets acquired from the beginning of the parties' relationship in California, 1988 (thereby increasing the community assets available for distribution and increasing her share of property).

Soon after Reynolds moved in with Walsh, they agreed that Walsh would pay Reynolds a salary for performing housekeeping at the home they shared. At Reynolds' request, Walsh fired her former housekeeper and hired Reynolds to perform the same work for the same pay. Walsh also made contributions to Reynolds' separate retirement account.

In 1989, Reynolds was laid off from her custom homebuilding job and returned to school at Fresno State University. Walsh paid Reynolds' tuition and other educational expenses; Reynolds completed her degree in 1993.

In 1992, Walsh gave birth to a daughter. Walsh paid Reynolds additional money for daycare services for her daughter. In early 1993, Reynolds moved out of Walsh's house, but Walsh continued to pay Reynolds for household and daycare services. A few months later, however, Reynolds moved back into Walsh's house. In December 1993, Reynolds adopted Walsh's daughter.

In 1996, Walsh gave birth to a son, whom Reynolds adopted in 1997. When Walsh was pregnant, she had decided to sell her private medical practice. The medical equipment sold for about $20,000.00. Walsh also sold for $131,766.22 one share of a local health management company, which she had acquired in 1987, the year before she met Reynolds. Walsh used these proceeds and a portion of her personal bank account to purchase a 20-acre eastern Fresno property in her own name. Walsh's income decreased significantly after she sold her practice, but she continued to pay Reynolds at the same rate as previously.

No. 44289-2-II

In 1998, Reynolds gave birth to a daughter, whom Walsh adopted in 2000. Walsh paid for all three adoptions, all the children's expenses, the entire mortgage, all utilities, and all other household expenses. When Reynolds paid for something for the children or for the household, she would request and receive reimbursement from Walsh. For purposes of buying household items, Walsh added Reynolds as an authorized user on Walsh's separate credit card in 2000; in 2007, Walsh added Reynolds as an authorized user on another separate credit card.

Between 1990 and 2011, Walsh paid Reynolds over $500,000. Walsh also paid off Reynolds' $7,500 credit card debt, which Reynolds later repaid to Walsh with a $500 monthly deduction from her daycare and housekeeping salary.

A. Registered Domestic Partners, California, 2000

On March 6, 2000, Walsh and Reynolds registered as domestic partners in California. That year, Walsh sold her eastern Fresno property and purchased a house in Tacoma, Washington, again in her own name. In June, Walsh and Reynolds moved to Washington, where Walsh found employment as an orthopedic surgeon.

Walsh and Reynolds continued their existing financial arrangement: Walsh paid the mortgage; health, dental, and auto insurance; the children's private school tuition; and other household expenses. Walsh also provided Reynolds with medical benefits by listing her as a domestic partner with her insurer, and continued to pay Reynolds an income. Walsh and Reynolds kept titles for their respective personal cars in their own names; title to the family car, however, was in both names.

In 2003, Walsh sold the Tacoma home and used the sale proceeds to purchase a home in Federal Way. This time, Walsh and Reynolds both signed the deed, which expressly stated that they were “acquir[ing] all interest” in the property “as joint tenants with right of survivorship, and not as community property or as tenants in common.” Clerk’s Papers (CP) at 368. Walsh, however, took out a mortgage on the Federal Way property solely in her name; again, Reynolds made no financial contribution to the home’s purchase or mortgage. Walsh also paid for all utilities, until the parties’ 2012 dissolution.

B. Registered Domestic Partners, Washington, 2009

In August 2009, Walsh and Reynolds registered as domestic partners in Washington. They separated seven months later on March 14, 2010.

II. PROCEDURE: DOMESTIC PARTNERSHIP DISSOLUTION TRIAL

Walsh petitioned for dissolution on March 11, 2011. The parties agreed on a parenting plan and child support order for their 16- and 13-year-old children. Post separation and dissolution, Walsh continues to pay for over 92 percent of the private school tuition for their son and younger daughter and nearly all college tuition and costs for their older daughter. Collectively, the parties had amassed over $2 million in real property, retirement, and investment accounts at the time of the dissolution. Only property distribution and attorney fee issues remained for trial.

After a three-day trial, the trial court assessed the five *Long*³ factors⁴ as applied to Walsh and Reynolds' relationship and found that they had lived and held themselves out as family for almost 23 years, since 1988, when they began cohabiting in California. The trial court also noted that if these two people "were a heterosexual couple that had been cohabiting since 1988 . . . this Court would not hesitate to find that a meretricious or equity relationship existed for the 20 plus years prior to the date of the [formal statutory Washington] marriage." Suppl. CP at 412.

Nevertheless, the trial court concluded that (1) the parties had lived in an "equity relationship" beginning January 1, 2005,⁵ until they registered as domestic partners under Washington's Domestic Partnership Act, chapter 26.60 RCW, in 2009; (2) therefore, the property the parties had acquired during this "equity relationship" period was subject to equitable distribution as if it were community property; and (3) the property the parties had obtained after their August 20, 2009 domestic partnership registration in Washington, but before their March 14, 2010 separation, was community property.

The trial court also (1) found that the parties owned the Federal Way residence as tenants in common; (2) ordered the residence sold; (3) awarded Walsh an initial $40,834.42 from the sale of the house for mortgage payments on the home before January 1, 2005⁶; and (3) divided the remaining proceeds 51.89 percent to Walsh and 48.11 percent to Reynolds. The trial court divided equally the remaining community property assets acquired between January 1, 2005, and March 14, 2010. The trial court awarded Reynolds $35,117.50 in attorney fees⁷ and $2,400.75 in costs, but no maintenance.

Walsh appeals and Reynolds cross-appeals.

ANALYSIS

Walsh argues that the trial court erred in ruling that (1) the “equity relationship” doctrine applied to the parties’ relationship before they registered as domestic partners in Washington on August 20, 2009, namely in acknowledging a non-Washington-registered “equity relationship” that began on January 1, 2005, when California amended its domestic partnership statute to extend community property rights to registered domestic partners⁸; (2) assets the parties accumulated during this “equity relationship,” between January 1, 2005, and August 20, 2009, were community property subject to distribution during the dissolution trial; and (3) the parties held the Federal Way home as tenants in common, rather than as joint tenants with a right of survivorship. Walsh further argues that the trial court erred in (4) distributing the proceeds of the Federal Way house sale equally; and (5) awarding Reynolds attorney fees and costs. Except for the trial court's finding that the parties' "equity relationship" began in 2005, we disagree with Walsh's contentions.

Reynolds cross-appeals, arguing that the trial court erred in (1) failing to characterize as joint assets the parties' assets accumulated before January 2005; (2) ruling that the parties' "equity relationship" commenced in January 2005, rather than in 1988; (3) ruling that Walsh and Reynolds held the Federal Way property as tenants in common; and (4) entering the decree of dissolution. We agree with Reynolds.

I. STANDARD OF REVIEW

We review a trial court's property distribution to determine whether substantial evidence supports its findings of fact, and whether those findings support its conclusions of law. In re Marriage of Pennington, 142 Wn.2d 592, 602-03, 14 P.3d 764 (2000). "Substantial evidence is 'evidence in sufficient quantum to persuade a fair-minded person of the truth of the declared premise.'" Gormley v. Robertson, 120 Wn. App. 31, 38, 83 P.3d 1042 (2004) (quoting Fred Hutchinson Cancer Research Ctr. v. Holman, 107 Wn.2d 693, 712, 732 P.2d 974 (1987)). We defer to the trial court's factual findings. Pennington, 142 Wn.2d at 602-03. But we review its conclusions of law de novo. Long, 158 Wn. App. at 925.

We review for abuse of discretion the trial court's distribution of property at the end of an "equity relationship." Long, 158 Wn. App. at 928. Once the trial court finds an "equity relationship," the court distributes all property the parties acquired through their efforts during the "equity relationship." Id. To divide the property justly and equitably, the trial court examines the relationship and the parties' property accumulation. Id. at 928-29 (citing In re Marriage of Lindsey, 101 Wn.2d 299, 304, 678 P.2d 328 (1984)). The trial "court may characterize property as ‘separate’ and ‘community’ by analogy to marital property.” Id. at 929 (quoting Connell v. Francisco, 127 Wn.2d 339, 351, 898 P.2d 831 (1995)); see RCW 26.16.010-.030 (definitions of separate and community property).

But, unlike a marriage dissolution, where all property is before the court, only community property is before the trial court for distribution at the end of an “equity relationship.” Id. at 929 (citing Connell, 127 Wn.2d at 351). Any increase in the “value of separate property is likewise separate in nature.” Id. (citing In re Marriage of Lindemann, 92 Wn. App. 64, 69, 960 P.2d 966 (1998)). Nevertheless,

“if the court is persuaded by direct and positive evidence that the increase in value of separate property is attributable to community labor or funds, the community may be equitably entitled to reimbursement for the contributions that caused the increase in value.”

Id. (emphasis added) (quoting Lindemann, 92 Wn. App. at 70).

II. COMMUNITY PROPERTY

Walsh and Reynolds had lived together since 1988, before formalizing their relationship by registering as domestic partners, first in California on March 6, 2000, and again in Washington on August 20, 2009. The trial court (1) characterized the parties’ relationship as an “equity relationship”⁹ between the 2005 amendment to California’s Domestic Partnership Act and the parties’ 2009 registration as domestic partners in Washington; and (2) ruled that the assets the parties had acquired during this period were community property under the common law “equity relationship” doctrine.¹⁰

Walsh contends that (1) RCW 26.60.080¹¹ limited the application of community property rights to registered domestic partnerships, beginning with either the effective date of Washington’s domestic partnership statute (June 12, 2008)¹² or the date the parties registered (here, August 20, 2009), whichever is later; (2) the trial court erred in ruling that the parties had an “equity relationship” between January 1, 2005, and August 20, 2009, when they registered as domestic partners in Washington; and (3) the trial court erred in ruling that the assets the parties acquired during that 4 ½-year period were community property, subject to distribution during their dissolution trial.

¹⁰ The trial court also ruled that property the parties had acquired after they registered as domestic partners in Washington—between August 20, 2009, and their separation on March 14, 2010—was subject to Washington’s community property law and RCW 26.60.080. Neither party disputes the trial court’s application of Washington’s statutory community property law to this post-August 20, 2009 period of their relationship. Thus, the trial court’s distribution of community property acquired during this latter period is not at issue on appeal.

¹¹ RCW 26.60.080, which governs community property rights of registered domestic partnerships, provides:

Any community property rights of domestic partners established by chapter 6, LAWS OF 2008 shall apply from the date of the initial registration of the domestic partnership or June 12, 2008, whichever is later.

In 2008, Washington registered domestic partners did not automatically enjoy rights such as community property; in contrast, California registered domestic partners enjoyed the rights and duties of marriage, including community property rights, as early as 2005. 2003 Cal. Stat. 3081, [§ 4, at] 3083[-84]. Walsh contends that (1) California’s broader grant of rights is a substantial difference between Washington’s domestic partnership rights before 2008; (2) consequently, Washington would not have recognized the relatively expansive domestic partnerships of California in 2008, Br. of Appellant at 7-8, 16; and (3) it was not until December 2009 that Washington’s domestic partnerships became “equivalent” to California’s. Br. of Appellant at 16 n.1. But because we can affirm the trial court’s ruling based on the alternative “equity relationship” doctrine, we need not address whether Washington would have recognized California’s domestic partnerships before 2008.

¹² LAWS OF 2008, ch. 6, § 601.

In her cross-appeal, Reynolds argues that, in distributing the parties' property at the dissolution trial, the trial court abused its discretion in applying the "equity relationship" doctrine to only this 4 ½-year post-Washington registration period and in failing to consider their entire 22-year relationship as an "equity relationship."¹³ Thus, we first address the propriety of the trial court's application of the "equity relationship" doctrine to the parties' pre-Washington-registration relationship. We next address whether the trial court erred in limiting application of the "equity relationship" doctrine to the 4 ½ years before the parties registration in Washington, rather than extending it to earlier periods of their relationship.

A. Application of "Equity Relationship" Doctrine Before 2008

Walsh contends that Washington's 2008 Domestic Partnership Act, chapter 26.60 RCW, did not extend community property rights to pre-existing registered California domestic partnerships under the "equity relationship" doctrine because the two states' community property rights schemes were not "substantially equivalent."¹⁴ See RCW 26.60.090¹⁵. Walsh is incorrect.

The "equity relationship" or "[meretricious] relationship" doctrine is a creature of common law, not statute. Lindsey, 101 Wn.2d at 304 (quoting Latham v. Hennessy, 87 Wn.2d

¹⁴ More specifically, Walsh argues that (1) RCW 26.60.090, which establishes reciprocity with other states' domestic partnership laws, provides that Washington will recognize "substantially equivalent" foreign domestic partnerships; (2) when California extended community property rights to domestic partners in 2003, Washington did not; and (3) therefore, Washington and California's domestic partnership laws were not "substantially equivalent." RCW 26.60.090.

¹⁵ The legislature amended RCW 26.60.090 in 2009, 2011, and 2012. LAWS OF 2012, ch. 3, § 12; LAWS OF 2011, ch. 9, § 1; LAWS OF 2009, ch. 521, § 72. These amendments did not alter the statute in any way relevant to this case; accordingly, we cite the current version of the statute.

550, 552-53, 554 P.2d 1057 (1976), overruled in part on other grounds by Lindsey, 101 Wn.2d at 303-04) (recognizing meretricious relationship doctrine and instructing trial courts to make “just and equitable” distribution of property when terminating such relationships).¹⁶ Thus, the trial court did not need to conclude that California’s and Washington’s domestic partnership statutory schemes were “substantially equivalent” in 2008 in order to apply Washington’s common law “equity relationship” doctrine to property that Walsh and Reynolds had acquired before they registered their domestic partnership in Washington in 2008.

In Washington, all property acquired during a marriage is presumptively community property. RCW 26.16.030; In re Marriage of Short, 125 Wn.2d 865, 870, 890 P.2d 12 (1995). In 2008, our state legislature expressly extended this community property presumption to property acquired during a registered domestic partnership, including partnerships registered in other states. RCW 26.16.030; LAWS OF 2008, ch. 6, § 604.¹⁷ Before the legislature’s statutory recognition of domestic partnerships in 2008, however, Washington courts recognized a common law “equity relationship” in a “stable, marital-like relationship where both parties cohabit with

¹⁷ RCW 26.60.090 expressly grants reciprocity to domestic partnerships already existing in other jurisdictions when Washington’s registered domestic partnership law became effective:

A legal union, other than a marriage, of two persons that was validly formed in another jurisdiction, and that is substantially equivalent to a domestic partnership under this chapter, shall be recognized as a valid domestic partnership in this state and shall be treated the same as a domestic partnership registered in this state regardless of whether it bears the name domestic partnership.

(Emphasis added).

knowledge that a lawful marriage between them does not exist.” Long, 158 Wn. App. at 925 (quoting Connell, 127 Wn.2d at 346).

Courts consider several factors in determining the existence of an “equity relationship;” “[N]o one factor is determinative” or “more important than another.” Long, 158 Wn. App. at 926. These factors include “continuous cohabitation, relationship duration, relationship purpose, pooling of resources and services for joint projects, and the parties’ intent.” Long, 158 Wn. App. at 926 (citing Connell, 127 Wn.2d at 346). “These factors are neither exclusive nor hypertechnical but rather a means to examine all relevant evidence.” Long, 158 Wn. App. at 926 (citing Pennington, 142 Wn.2d at 602).

Here, the trial court assessed the five Long factors as applied to Walsh’s and Reynolds’ relationship and entered the following findings of fact and conclusions of law:

1. Continuous Cohabitation: The trial court found, and the record shows, “But for a few brief interruptions, the parties continuously cohabited from 1988 until 2010.” Suppl. CP at 411.
2. Relationship Duration: The trial court found that the parties’ relationship “lasted approximately 23 years.” Suppl. CP at 411.
3. Relationship Purpose: The trial court found, “The purpose of this relationship was to create a family. This is evidenced by the parties’ conception, birth, and cross adoption of three children, living together in an intimate committed relationship, supporting each other emotionally and financially and holding themselves out to the world as a family.” Suppl. CP at 411.
4. Pooling of Resources: The trial court found that, although Walsh was the principal income earner, both Walsh and Reynolds “contributed their time and energy to . . . raising . . .

No. 44289-2-II

their family” and to “joint projects such as the extensive remodel of the Federal Way home.”
Suppl. CP at 411.

5. Parties’ Intent: The trial court found that, although the parties “clearly intended to keep certain assets separate,” there was “no doubt that they intended to live together as a family.”
Suppl. CP at 411.

Substantial evidence supports these findings, including that Walsh and Reynolds intended to be in a marriage-like relationship with a shared purpose. The record contains substantial evidence of their permanency planning, shared love and intimacy, adopting and raising children as a couple, extended family relationships, caring for one another when sick, providing financial and non-financial support for each other and their children, and holding themselves out as a couple. That they later formalized their relationship by registering as statutory domestic partners does not defeat application of the common law “equity relationship” doctrine to their years together before the statutory registration option became available to them. We hold that the trial court correctly ruled that Walsh and Reynolds lived in an “equity relationship” before they registered as domestic partners in Washington in 2009, beginning at least as far back as the January 1, 2005 date the trial court chose.

We also hold, however, that the trial court erred in limiting application of the “equity relationship” doctrine to only the 4 ½ years before the parties registered in Washington. There are several other dates that could serve as starting points for application of this doctrine here. We first consider the parties’ registration in California. California’s legislature first recognized domestic partnerships between same-sex couples in 1999, when it enacted CAL. FAM. CODE § 297. In 2003, California expanded this statute to give domestic partnerships the same statutory rights and benefits as married heterosexual couples, thereby expressly extending community property rights to domestic partnerships. CAL. FAM. CODE § 297.5(k)(1). Walsh and Reynolds registered as domestic partners in California in 2000, receiving the benefits of California's community property rights law both at that time and later when the statute was amended in 2003.

We see no reason why the five Long "equity relationship" factors that the trial court applied to the parties' post-2005 relationship should not also apply to their pre-2005 domestic partnership relationship in California,¹⁸ which, as the trial court here expressly recognized, involved continuous cohabitation for "approximately 23 years" in a relationship for which the purpose was "to create a family" while "holding themselves out to the world as a family." Suppl. CP at 411. Throughout their relationship, both Walsh and Reynolds "contributed their time and energy to . . . raising . . . their family" and to "joint projects," with "no doubt that they intended to live together as a family." Suppl. CP at 411. We hold, therefore, that the trial court should have extended application of the "equity relationship" doctrine to the parties' relationship before 2005, including their registered domestic partnership under California's act, an unimpeachable indicator of the intended nature of their relationship.

1. No statutory preemption before 2008

But Walsh also argues that, because the legislature "devised a statutory means of resolving property distribution issues by enacting RCW 26.09.080" and applying it to domestic partners in 2008,¹⁹ this statute preempts the common law “equity relationship” doctrine. Br. of Appellant at 25. To the extent that she argues the statute retroactively preempted common law equity doctrine before 2008, when there was no legislation in Washington, Walsh is incorrect. During most of Walsh’s and Reynolds’ 22-year relationship, Washington’s statutes neither recognized same-sex domestic partnerships nor prescribed a means of resolving their property distribution issues that expressly preempted common law. Until our legislature enacted RCW 26.09.080 and provided statutory community property rights for registered domestic partnerships, only the common law “equity relationship” doctrine addressed property distribution for such partnerships.

This common law “equity relationship” doctrine does not depend on the formality or “legality” of the parties’ marriage or relationship. Vasquez v. Hawthorne, 145 Wn.2d 103, 107, 33 P.3d 735 (2001). For relationships that existed before our legislature enacted RCW 26.09.080, courts could apply the “equity relationship” doctrine to couples like Walsh and Reynolds, find that they had been living in a “meretricious” or “equity” relationship, and, consequently, distribute their community property equitably. *See Id.*²⁰ Although RCW

¹⁹ RCW 26.09.080 governs the disposition of property and liabilities in a dissolution and provides relevant factors for a court to consider when distributing assets, such as:

- (1) The nature and extent of the community property;
- (2) The nature and extent of the separate property;
- (3) The duration of the marriage or domestic partnership; and
- (4) The economic circumstances of each spouse or domestic partner at the time the division of property is to become effective.

The legislature amended the statute in 2008 to include the terms “domestic partner” and “domestic partnership” in addition to “spouse” and “marriage.” See LAWS OF 2008, ch. 6, § 1011.

²⁰ As our Supreme Court has more specifically explained:

26.09.080 provides a framework for a trial court's distribution of a couple's domestic partnership property, the 2008 amendments to this statute do not retroactively affect the rights, benefits, and property expectations of parties to a meretricious or "equity relationship" accrued before the amendment's effective date in 2008. See LAWS OF 2008, ch. 6 § 1011. Thus, this statute does not control distribution of property that Walsh and Reynolds accumulated during their relationship before the 2008 amendment.

Walsh also cites RCW 26.60.080 as purporting to show that the legislature intended domestic partners to enjoy community property rights only as of the statute's effective date or the date the parties registered as domestic partners, whichever came later. Here, the trial court correctly ruled that the parties' pre-2008 community property rights were based on the common law "equity relationship" doctrine, rights that already existed before our legislature enacted RCW 26.60.080, formalizing community property rights "established by [chapter 26.60 RCW]" and expressly extending them to registered domestic partners effective 2008. RCW 26.60.080. Agreeing with the trial court on this point, we hold that RCW 26.60.080 did not erase the parties'

When equitable claims are brought, the focus remains on the equities involved between the parties. Equitable claims are not dependent on the "legality" of the relationship between the parties, nor are they limited by the gender or sexual orientation of the parties. For example, the use of the term "marital-like" in prior meretricious relationship cases is a mere analogy because defining these relationships as related to marriage would create a de facto common-law marriage, which this court has refused to do. [Pennington, 142 Wn.2d at 601]. Rather than relying on analogy, equitable claims must be analyzed under the specific facts presented in each case. Even when we recognize "factors" to guide the court's determination of the equitable issues presented, these considerations are not exclusive, but are intended to reach all relevant evidence.

“equity relationship” that already existed before they registered as domestic partners in Washington.

2. Findings of fact; conclusions of law

Walsh also argues that substantial evidence does not support the trial court’s factual findings. Relying on Pennington, Walsh contends that the trial court should have reached a different conclusion after weighing the five Long factors.²¹ Walsh asserts that, contrary to the trial court’s findings, the parties did not pool their resources, arguing that instead they made a “concerted effort to remain separate financial entities,” such as by maintaining separate bank accounts and by never entering into a joint debt. Br. of Appellant at 31.

But we defer to the trial court’s factual findings as long as substantial evidence supports them. Pennington, 142 Wn.2d at 602-03. As we have already explained, here the evidence and the trial court’s application of the five Long factors support the trial court’s characterizing the parties’ post-2005 relationship as an “equity relationship.” Suppl. CP at 412.

3. Cross-appeal

In her cross-appeal, Reynolds argues that the trial court erred in declining to apply the “equity relationship” doctrine to the first 17 years of the parties’ 22-year relationship. Walsh counters that (1) the trial court “properly considered the common law, [applicable] statutes, and the length and nature of the parties' relationship"²² when it limited application of the "equity relationship" doctrine to the latter period of their relationship between January 1, 2005, and August 20, 2009; but (2) in so doing, the trial court erred in using January 1, 2005, as the date on which their "equity relationship" began and their separate properties converted to community property, rather than August 20, 2009, the date when the parties registered as domestic partners in Washington.

²¹ More specifically, Walsh argues that, in Pennington, the Washington Supreme Court held that the parties did not meet the “pooling of resources” factor because they did not purchase property jointly, did not contribute jointly to their retirement accounts, and maintained separate bank accounts. Br. of Appellant at 28 (quoting Pennington, 142 Wn.2d at 607). Nevertheless, Walsh acknowledges that the purpose of her relationship with Reynolds was to “co-parent” their children. Br. of Appellant at 29. Walsh’s “co-parent” assertion supports the trial court’s finding that the parties held themselves out as one family, which weighs in favor of its finding an “equity relationship”.

We agree with Walsh that the trial court erred in using January 1, 2005, as the start date; but we disagree that the date should have been August 20, 2009. The findings of fact and the record do not support the trial court's legal conclusion that the parties' "equity relationship" began no earlier than 2005. Pennington, 142 Wn.2d at 602-03; see Long, 158 Wn. App. at 925 (we review de novo the trial court's legal rulings).

As the trial court explained,

If the two people in this case were a heterosexual couple that had been cohabiting since 1988, . . . this Court would not hesitate to find that a meretricious or equity relationship existed for the 20 plus years prior to the date of the marriage.

Suppl. CP at 412. Nevertheless, the trial court declined to consider whether the facts supported applying the "equity relationship" doctrine to any period during the first 17 years of these parties' relationship, reasoning that characterizing their properties before California's domestic partnership law became effective on January 1, 2005, would "retroactive[ly]" alter their "property rights without due process of law."²³ Reynolds contends that (1) this statement shows that the trial court treated the initial period of the parties' same-sex relationship differently than it would have treated a heterosexual relationship; and (2) acknowledging an “equity relationship” does not require “retroactive application” of laws governing domestic partnerships and “is no different than other cases where heterosexual couples cohabit prior to marrying.”²⁴ Br. of Resp’t at 27.

²² Reply Br. of Appellant at 5 (emphasis omitted).

²³ Suppl. CP at 412, 413. Neither party raises a due process argument on appeal.

RCW 26.09.080 gives the trial court broad discretion in crafting a just and equitable distribution of the parties’ property, which distribution we will not disturb on appeal absent a showing that the trial court committed a manifest abuse of discretion. In re Marriage of Hilt, 41 Wn. App. 434, 439, 704 P.2d 672 (1985) (citing In re Marriage of Miracle, 101 Wn.2d 137, 675 P.2d 1229 (1984); Baker v. Baker, 80 Wn.2d 736, 498 P.2d 315 (1972)). In light of the trial court’s comprehensive and detailed overall distribution of Walsh and Reynolds’ separate and community assets, we cannot say that the trial court abused its discretion in ruling that the parties’ non-separate assets became community property beginning at least as early as in 2005 and in crafting its property distribution accordingly.

But the trial court failed to consider the common law and its application to the parties’ “equity relationship” that existed before California’s 2005 statutory recognition of such relationships, despite explaining that had Walsh and Reynolds been a legally recognized heterosexual marriage, it would not have “hesitate[d] to find that a meretricious or “equity relationship” existed for the 20 plus years prior to the date of the marriage.” Suppl. CP at 412. Thus, we remand to the trial court to consider the extent of the parties’ “equity relationship” during this earlier pre-2005 period, to apply the five Long factors to this portion of their relationship, and to revise its property distribution accordingly.

B. Tenancy in Common, Federal Way Property

Walsh also argues that, although the trial court correctly determined that the parties owned the Federal Way property as tenants in common, the trial court improperly allocated the proceeds from the property’s sale. Walsh concedes that Reynolds contributed to the property in the form of “sweat equity.” Br. of Appellant at 37-38. Nevertheless, Walsh asserts that the trial court should have awarded her 100 percent of the equity in the Federal Way property, rather than 51.89 percent, because “[s]he made all financial contributions towards the mortgage and reconstruction of the Federal Way house . . . from her separate property funds.” Br. of Appellant at 37. This argument fails.

In Reynolds’ cross-appeal, she argues that (1) the trial court erred in concluding that the parties held the Federal Way home as tenants in common; and (2) instead, they owed it as joint tenants with a right of survivorship. According to Reynolds, when the parties purchased the Federal Way property, they titled it in both of their names as “joint tenants with right of survivorship, and not as community property or tenants in common.” Br. of Resp’t at 33-34. Reynolds is correct about the language on the title; but this language alone does not determine the legal character of the property. See Merrick v. Peterson, 25 Wn. App. 248, 258, 606 P.2d 700 (1980) (joint tenancy with right of survivorship requires all “four unities of time, title, interest and possession”; it is not enough to have only unity of title).

The trial court acknowledged that the Federal Way property title “express[ed] [the parties’] intent” to hold the property as joint tenants with right of survivorship. Suppl. CP at 420. Nevertheless, it concluded that, because only Walsh was liable on the mortgage, she and Reynolds held the property as “tenants in common”. CP at 375. Even under the trial court’s “tenants in common” characterization, Reynolds contends that (1) Walsh’s mortgage obligation did not terminate the joint tenancy with right of survivorship; and (2) even if the trial court had concluded that the parties owned the property as tenants in common, the trial court acted within its discretion in dividing the parties’ assets equitably, rather than awarding 100 percent of the equity to Walsh. We agree with the trial court that the parties held the Federal Way property as “tenants in common,” despite their stated intent to hold title as joint tenants with right of survivorship. We also agree with Reynolds, however, that because of the parties’ existing “equity relationship,” the trial court did not abuse its discretion in dividing the value of the property as it did.

RCW 64.28.020 governs joint tenancy with a right of survivorship: “Every interest created in favor of two or more persons in their own right is an interest in common . . . unless declared in its creation to be a joint tenancy, as provided in RCW 64.28.010,” which, RCW 64.28.010, in turn, provides that “[j]oint tenancy shall be created only by written instrument, which . . . shall expressly declare the interest created to be a joint tenancy.” RCW 64.28.010. “It is well settled that a joint tenancy with survivorship is created when the four unities of time, title, interest and possession exist.” Merrick, 25 Wn. App. at 258 (citing Holohan v. Melville, 41 Wn.2d 380, 249 P.2d 777 (1952)). “In a true joint tenancy, each of the tenants has an undivided interest in the whole, and not the whole of an undivided interest.” Merrick, 25 Wn. App. at 258.

The record here shows that the parties never became joint tenants because they did not have the requisite unity under Merrick: Reynolds was not liable on the mortgage. Thus, any joint tenancy severed at its inception. See Merrick, 25 Wn. App. at 258. Despite the parties' clear specification that they took the property as joint tenants with right of survivorship, Walsh's unilaterally undertaking the mortgage obligation (1) was inconsistent with the "unity" interest element, essential to create such a joint tenancy; and (2) automatically "converted" what might have been joint tenancy with right of survivorship into a tenancy in common. Merrick, 25 Wn. App. at 258 ("[A]ny agreement subsequently executed which is inconsistent with the joint tenancy converts it into a tenancy in common.") We hold, therefore, that the trial court correctly concluded as a matter of law that Walsh and Reynolds owned the Federal Way property as tenants in common.

Nevertheless, in a dissolution proceeding, a trial court has discretion to divide the parties' assets in a manner that it determines is "just and equitable." In re Marriage of Farmer, 172 Wn.2d 616, 625, 259 P.3d 256 (2011) (quoting RCW 29.06.080). Considering Reynolds' non-financial contributions to the property and regardless of Walsh's claims of her separate property contributions, the trial court here exercised this discretion by awarding Reynolds "close to a 50 [percent] share in the equity in the Federal Way home." Suppl. CP at 495. The trial court also based its decision, in part, on the fact that it did not award any maintenance to Reynolds, the party with far less income and earning potential.

We hold that the trial court did not abuse its broad discretion in the manner in which it crafted a just and equitable division of the parties' non-separate properties, including its allocation of the equity in the Federal Way property, after balancing the parties' respective needs and contributions. We also hold, however, that the trial court erred in refusing to consider that the parties had a common law “equity relationship” before January 1, 2005, for community property distribution purposes.

III. ATTORNEY FEES

A. Trial

Walsh contends that the trial court erred in awarding Reynolds her attorney fees and costs. Walsh argues that (1) the 2008 Domestic Partnership Act, chapter 26.60 RCW, does not permit a trial court to award attorney fees in a dissolution; and (2) RCW 26.09.140’s fee-shifting provision, which applies generally to dissolutions, did not apply to domestic partnership dissolutions until December 3, 2009. Reynolds counters that the trial court acted within its discretion when it awarded her fees and costs. We agree with Reynolds.

B. Standard of Review

Attorney fees in a dissolution proceeding are based on need and ability to pay. In re Marriage of Terry, 79 Wn. App. 866, 871, 905 P.2d 935 (1995). We review a trial court’s attorney fee award for abuse of discretion. Kellar v. Estate of Kellar, 172 Wn. App. 562, 591, 291 P.3d 906 (2012), review denied, 178 Wn.2d 1025 (2013). In determining a reasonable fee, we consider the difficulty of the case, the time involved in the preparation and presentation of the case, and the amount and character of property involved. In re Marriage of Knight, 75 Wn. App. 721, 730, 880 P.2d 71 (1994).

C. Application of RCW 26.09.140 to Domestic Partnership Dissolution

The trial court first ruled that RCW 26.09.140 applied to registered domestic partnership dissolutions. The trial court then found that “Walsh has the ability to pay, and [that] Reynolds has a need. The disparity in income requires this Court to award [Reynolds] 100 percent of her attorney's fees to be paid by [Walsh]." Suppl. CP at 416. The trial court determined Reynolds' fee award according to the factors in Knight, and In re Marriage of Irwin, 64 Wn. App. 38, 822 P.2d 797 (1992); and it ordered Walsh to pay Reynolds $35,117.50 in attorney fees and $2,400.75 in costs.

Walsh asserts that, because the parties registered their domestic partnership in August 2009, before the legislature amended RCW 26.09.140 to include the current fee-shifting provision, the trial court should not have applied this amendment to their dissolution. But Walsh petitioned for dissolution in March 2011, more than a year after the fee-shifting amendment took effect in December 2009. Thus, the trial court properly applied RCW 26.09.140's fee-shifting provision to the parties' 2011 dissolution proceeding, the "precipitating event" for purposes of falling under this 2009 amendment. State v. Pillatos, 159 Wn.2d 459, 471, 150 P.2d 1130 (2007). A "statute operates prospectively when the precipitating event for operation of the statute occurs after enactment, even when the precipitating event originated in a situation existing prior to enactment." Pillatos, 159 Wn.2d at 471 (emphasis omitted) (quoting In re Estate of Burns, 131 Wn.2d 104, 110-11, 928 P.2d 1094 (1997)).

Walsh also argues that substantial evidence does not support an award of attorney fees and costs to Reynolds, because, over the course of their relationship, Walsh provided Reynolds with significant assets and financial benefits, which Reynolds could have used to pay her own attorney fees. But Walsh fails to provide any authority to support her implicit argument that a trial court abuses its discretion by awarding attorney fees to a party who has received assets during the relationship and after dissolution. Nor does Walsh otherwise meet the high burden of showing abuse of trial court discretion in its attorney fee award. In re Custody of Smith, 137 Wn.2d 1, 22, 969 P.2d 21 (1998) (citing Knight, 75 Wn. App. at 729), aff'd, Troxel v. Granville, 530 U.S. 57, 120 S. Ct. 2054, 147 L. Ed. 2d 49 (2000). Thus, we do not further address this argument. RAP 10.3(a)(6).

Walsh next argues that, even if the trial court did not abuse its discretion, we should reduce the attorney fee award to Reynolds because it was unreasonable. Walsh contends that, under the Knight factors, (1) the facts of the case were not difficult, (2) it was unreasonable to require her to pay fees for time Reynolds' attorney spent becoming familiar with local rules, (3) these fees were excessive given the relatively short period of the parties' registered Washington domestic partnership, and (4) the fees were unreasonable because Reynolds "had no reasonable awareness as to" how much she incurred in attorney fees. Br. of Appellant at 45. Walsh ignores that the trial court already reduced Reynolds' fees by subtracting from the requested amount the "attorney's time to familiarize herself with [Pierce County Local Rules] ($845.00)," "discovery not in compliance with [Pierce County Local Rules] ($345.00)," and "[a]ttorney fees. . . [for a] trial brief never submitted ($1,445.00)." Suppl. CP at 474.

Walsh does not show that the trial court's discretionary determination of attorney fees was unreasonable. Therefore, we affirm the trial court's attorney fee and costs award at trial.

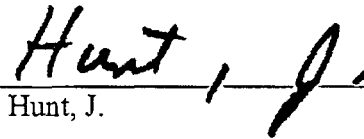

D. Appeal

Reynolds also asks us to award her attorney fees and costs on appeal based on her need and Walsh's ability to pay, citing RCW 26.09.140. This statute provides that, in an appeal of a trial court's order in a dissolution proceeding, "the appellate court may, in its discretion, order a party to pay for the cost to the other party of maintaining the appeal and attorneys' fees in addition to statutory costs.” Thus, we have discretion to award attorney fees after considering the relative resources of the parties and the merits of the appeal. In re Marriage of Leslie, 90 Wn. App. 796, 807, 954 P.2d 330 (1998), review denied, 137 Wn.2d 1003 (1999); RAP 18.1. Because Reynolds prevails on appeal, we grant her attorney fees and costs on appeal, subject to her demonstrating to our court commissioner her need relative to Walsh’s ability to pay and her submitting supporting documentation.

We reverse the trial court’s property distribution and remand to the trial court (1) to reconsider whether the parties had a common law “equity relationship” before January 1, 2005; and (2) if so, to redistribute the parties’ community assets accordingly. We affirm the trial court’s award of attorney fees and costs to Reynolds.
