Requiring a lawyer to review the forms does not protect the public. The best example is that of the living trust industry -- lawyers were used to "review" the living trusts. The trusts themselves contained lawyer-created clauses. However, intake consisted of the who, what, where type of questions with answers sent to a center. Non-lawyers (trained in this method) would select clauses and create a document. I do hope you can imagine the problems associated with this. The final review of the document was perfunctory at best. After all, the clauses were professionally drafted.

Please, don't create difficulties by accepting this proposed GR.
