

No. 43388-5-II

Washington conviction for conspiracy to deliver controlled substances; one Ohio conviction for aggravated burglary, and one California conviction for attempted theft of elder over $400. The State contended that all five convictions should be included in Burch's offender score, which would make his offender score 5 and his standard sentence range 14 to 18 months of confinement. Burch contended that the Ohio and California convictions should not be included in his offender score because they were not comparable to Washington crimes. Thus, he contended that his offender score should be 3, which would make his standard sentence range 4 to 12 months of confinement. The trial court found that the Ohio and California convictions were comparable to Washington crimes. It found Burch's offender score to be 5 and his standard sentence range to be 14 to 18 months. It then found both sentence aggravators were present and imposed an exceptional sentence of 80 months of confinement.

Burch argues that the trial court erred in finding that the Ohio and California convictions were comparable to Washington felonies, as required under RCW 9.94A.525(3). He also argues that the trial court erred in not conducting its comparability analysis on the record. State v. Labarbera, 128 Wn. App. 343, 349, 115 P.3d 1038 (2005). The State concedes that the court erred in finding the Ohio and California convictions were comparable to Washington felonies. But it contends that because the court imposed an exceptional sentence, any error in calculating Burch's offender score and standard sentence range is harmless.

"When a sentencing court incorrectly calculates the standard range before imposing an exceptional sentence, remand is the remedy unless the record clearly indicates the sentencing court would have imposed the same sentence anyway." In re Pers. Restraint of Rowland, 149 Wn. App. 496, 508, 204 P.3d 953 (2009) (citing State v. Parker, 132 Wn.2d 182, 189, 937 P.2d 575 (1997)). While the record is clear that the trial court would have imposed an exceptional sentence if Burch's standard sentence range was 4 to 12 months instead of 14 to 18 months, it is not clear that the trial court would have imposed an 80-month exceptional sentence. Accordingly, we reverse Burch's sentence and remand for resentencing.

A majority of the panel having determined that this opinion will not be printed in the Washington Appellate Reports, but will be filed for public record in accordance with RCW 2.06.040, it is so ordered.
